The company announced that several major changes would be introduced the following year. Employees were initially concerned, although management insisted that the changes should improve working conditions. Some employees argued that the problems could have been avoided if management had acted earlier. Others believed that the previous difficulties might have been caused by a lack of communication. The final report suggested that several mistakes must have been made during the planning stage. It also stated that some of the information may have been misunderstood by employees. In retrospect, the company needn't have spent so much money on some of the measures, although it had been impossible to know this at the time.
