Modern consumers increasingly expect companies to provide fast and reliable services. When a product stops working, customers often have it repaired rather than replacing it immediately. In some cases, however, products are designed in such a way that they cannot easily be repaired.

Several manufacturers are now being criticised for this approach. They are believed to be making products that are more difficult to repair because this may encourage customers to buy new ones. Some companies deny these accusations, while others have introduced repair programmes.

In one country, new regulations are expected to be introduced next year. Manufacturers will be required to provide spare parts for certain products, and customers will be given more information about repair options.

Consumer organisations welcome the changes. They believe that if products are repaired more often, less electronic waste will be produced. However, some manufacturers argue that the new rules could increase production costs.

The debate is expected to continue for several years.
