The company has announced that it will proceed with the project provided that the final costs remain within the agreed budget. Should additional funding be required, the management team will have to reconsider the timetable.

Were the project to be delayed significantly, several departments would be affected. Had the company anticipated the current difficulties, it might have adopted a different strategy at the beginning.

The director maintains that the project can still succeed. Even if some of the original assumptions prove to be incorrect, the company intends to continue. However, unless the financial situation improves, further investment may not be possible.

But for the support of several external partners, the project would already have been cancelled. Whether or not the final plan receives unanimous approval, management intends to begin implementation next month.
