The company confirmed that the new policy would be introduced in January. According to the management, the changes were necessary because operating costs had increased significantly.

The director maintained that the decision would benefit employees in the long term, although several members of staff disagreed. One employee claimed to have received no information about the changes before the announcement.

The company denied having deliberately withheld information and insisted that all employees had been informed in accordance with the existing procedures.

An independent report later revealed that several departments had received incomplete information. The report recommended that the company improve its communication system.

It is now widely believed that the organisation needs to reconsider how major decisions are communicated to its employees.
