7. Reading

Had the company acted sooner, the situation might have been very different. Several employees had warned management that the existing system was becoming unreliable, but no immediate action was taken.

If the warnings had been taken seriously, the company would probably not be facing such serious problems now. The director later admitted that, had he known how quickly the situation would deteriorate, he would have ordered an investigation much earlier.

Even if the company manages to solve the immediate problem, it will still need to reconsider its procedures. Assuming that the necessary changes are introduced, the organisation should be able to prevent similar incidents in the future.

If it weren't for the support of several experienced employees, the situation could be considerably worse. Whether or not the company accepts responsibility, it will have to demonstrate that effective changes have been made.
