The company spokesperson claimed that the new strategy would significantly improve performance. However, several independent analysts questioned this assessment. One analyst pointed out that similar strategies had failed in the past, while another suggested that the company might be underestimating the costs.

The chief executive acknowledged that the project involved considerable risks but maintained that the potential benefits outweighed them. She denied having ignored the analysts' concerns and insisted that the company should continue with the project.

According to the official statement, additional measures will be introduced to reduce the risks. However, the statement stopped short of guaranteeing that the project would succeed.

The report also noted that, although management had initially promised to publish the complete results, it had later agreed to release only a summary. Critics accused the company of attempting to control the public narrative, an allegation the company strongly rejected.
