6. Reading

Never before had the organisation faced such intense public criticism. The controversy began after a report revealed serious weaknesses in its internal procedures. What surprised the public most was not the existence of the problems but the fact that senior management had apparently known about them for months.

Only after the report had been published did the board announce an independent investigation. Not only did the organisation admit that some procedures had been inadequate, but it also promised to introduce significant reforms.

So serious was the situation that several senior employees resigned. Little did they realise, however, that their decisions would attract even more media attention.

It was the lack of transparency that caused the greatest damage to the organisation's reputation. What matters now is whether the proposed reforms will actually be implemented.

Under no circumstances should the organisation assume that public trust will return automatically. Only by demonstrating genuine change can it rebuild its reputation.
