9. Reading

Modern workplaces are changing rapidly, and employees are increasingly expected to adapt to new technologies. Some workers may feel uncertain about these changes, but companies are often obliged to provide appropriate training.

An employee who refuses to develop new skills might eventually find it difficult to remain competitive. However, workers should not be expected to accept every technological change without question. They ought to be given an opportunity to understand why a particular system is being introduced and how it will affect their work.

In some cases, employees may have been using outdated methods for years without realising how inefficient they are. Others may have been working under considerable pressure because their employers failed to provide adequate equipment.

Managers should have recognised these problems earlier. They could have invested in training programmes or improved the equipment before the situation became serious.

Nevertheless, technological change is bound to continue. Employees might as well accept that lifelong learning will increasingly be part of professional life.
