READING B1

The recruitment process

Finding a job is often more than simply sending a CV. First, candidates need to identify positions that match their qualifications and experience. They then prepare their CV and application documents.

After receiving applications, employers may select a group of candidates for an interview. During the interview, recruiters usually want to learn more about the candidate's experience, skills and motivation.

Sometimes candidates are asked to complete an additional task or attend a second interview.

A successful candidate may then receive a job offer. Before accepting it, however, they should carefully check the working conditions, responsibilities and salary.

Questions

1. What should candidates do before applying?
 2. What documents do they prepare?
 3. What happens after employers receive applications?
 4. What do recruiters want to learn during interviews?
 5. What may happen after the first interview?
 6. What should candidates check before accepting a job offer?

LISTENING B1

Posłuchaj nagrania.

When I applied for my current position, I first checked whether my experience matched the company's requirements. I then updated my CV and wrote a short cover letter. I was invited to an interview with two members of the recruitment team. They asked me about my previous responsibilities, my strengths and a difficult situation I had dealt with at work. After the interview, I was asked to complete a short practical task. A week later, I received a job offer.

Questions

1. What did the speaker check first?
 2. What documents did the speaker prepare?
 3. Who conducted the interview?
 4. What did they ask about?
 5. What happened after the interview?
 6. When did the speaker receive the job offer?
