CZĘŚĆ G — READING

Had the town introduced the new transport system ten years ago, traffic congestion might be considerably lower today. At the time, however, local authorities believed that the project would be too expensive.

If they had invested in public transport then, thousands of residents would probably be using it now. The situation illustrates how decisions made in the past can affect the present.

The authorities are now considering a new project. Assuming that sufficient funding can be found, construction could begin next year. However, even if the project receives financial support, several technical problems will have to be solved first.

If it weren't for the support of local businesses, the project would probably be impossible to finance. Whether or not all residents support the plan, the authorities have decided that changes are necessary.

Should the project succeed, the town could become a model for other communities. Had the authorities ignored the current problems, however, the situation would almost certainly have become worse.
