CZĘŚĆ G — READING

Never before had the city faced such criticism. The problems had existed for years, but only after an independent investigation was published did the public become fully aware of their scale.

What concerned residents most was not simply the lack of investment but the absence of a clear long-term strategy. Not only had the authorities failed to address the immediate problems, but they had also postponed several major decisions.

So serious was the situation that several organisations demanded immediate action. Under no circumstances, they argued, should the authorities continue to delay the necessary reforms.

It was the lack of communication that caused much of the public frustration. Only by involving residents in the decision-making process can the authorities rebuild trust.

What happens next will depend on whether the proposed reforms are actually implemented.
