CZĘŚĆ H — READING

Przeczytaj tekst:

Many people replace electronic devices as soon as they stop working. However, more products are now being designed to be repaired. In some countries, manufacturers are being required to provide spare parts and repair information.

Consumers are also changing their habits. Instead of buying a new phone, some people have their old devices repaired. Others get their computers upgraded rather than replacing them completely.

Several large companies are believed to be developing new repair programmes. These programmes are expected to reduce electronic waste. However, critics argue that many devices are still difficult to repair.

Environmental organisations believe that more should be done. They argue that products should be designed to last longer and that consumers should be given clear information about repair costs.

The debate is expected to continue, but governments are increasingly introducing regulations designed to encourage repair rather than replacement.
