CZĘŚĆ G — READING

Przeczytaj tekst:

The modern workplace is changing rapidly. Employees are increasingly expected to learn new skills and adapt to new technologies. Some workers may find this difficult, particularly if they have been doing the same job for many years.

Companies are often required to provide appropriate training, but employees also have responsibilities. They should be willing to learn and may need to change the way they work.

If a company introduces a new system without adequate preparation, employees might become frustrated. Managers should have explained the reasons for the change earlier.

They could have provided additional training or asked employees for their opinions.

In some cases, workers may have been using inefficient methods for years. They might not have realised that a better solution was available.

Technological change is bound to continue. Employees might as well accept that learning new skills will probably become a normal part of professional life.
