READING C1

The search for identity

Identity is often described as something personal and stable. In reality, however, it is constantly shaped and reshaped by our experiences, relationships and social environment.

From an early age, people receive messages about how they are expected to behave. Family members, teachers and peers may consciously or unconsciously influence their choices. Social norms can provide a sense of belonging, but they may also limit individuality when people feel unable to challenge them.

The rise of social media has added another dimension to this process. Individuals can now construct carefully controlled versions of themselves and present them to potentially large audiences. While this can encourage creativity and self-expression, it can also increase the desire for external validation.

It is important, however, not to assume that social media determines identity. Individuals remain capable of making independent choices and rejecting expectations they consider inappropriate.

The challenge lies in finding a balance between belonging to a community and maintaining a sense of authenticity.

 2. How can social norms be positive?
 3. How can social norms limit individuality?

LISTENING C1

Posłuchaj nagrania.

There is a growing debate about whether young people today have more freedom to express their individuality or whether they are actually under greater social pressure than previous generations. On the one hand, digital platforms allow people to find communities that share their interests and values. On the other hand, the constant visibility of other people's lives can encourage comparison and create unrealistic expectations. Ultimately, the impact depends to a considerable extent on how consciously individuals use these platforms and how capable they are of distinguishing authentic self-expression from the desire for approval.

Questions

1. What is the central debate?
 2. What is one advantage of digital platforms?
 3. What is one disadvantage?
 4. What can comparison create?
 5. What does the impact depend on?
