Family and independence

Young people often want greater independence as they get older.

Parents may be concerned about:

- safety,
- education,
- money,
- friends,
- lifestyle.

Young people may feel that:

- they are not trusted,
- their privacy is limited,
- parents have unrealistic expectations.

The solution is often open communication and compromise.

READING B2

Independence and family relationships

Growing up often involves a gradual move towards independence. Teenagers increasingly want to make their own decisions, manage their time and develop their own identity.

Parents, however, may find this process difficult. They remain responsible for their children's safety and education, while young people increasingly expect privacy and freedom.

The resulting conflict is sometimes described as a generation gap. Yet disagreement between parents and teenagers does not necessarily indicate a bad relationship. In many cases, conflict is a normal part of becoming independent.

The key issue is how disagreements are handled. Excessive control may damage trust, while a complete lack of boundaries can create other problems. A balanced approach requires communication, clear expectations and mutual respect.

Questions

1. Why do teenagers want more independence?
 2. Why can parents find this difficult?
 3. What is a generation gap?
 4. Does disagreement necessarily mean a bad relationship?
 5. What can excessive control cause?
 6. What can solve many conflicts?

LISTENING B2

Posłuchaj nagrania.

In my opinion, parents should gradually give teenagers more independence rather than suddenly expecting them to become responsible adults. Young people need opportunities to make decisions and experience the consequences of those decisions. At the same time, parents still have a responsibility to protect them. The best solution is probably not complete freedom or strict control, but a gradual increase in responsibility based on trust.

Questions

1. What should parents gradually give teenagers?
 2. Why should teenagers make their own decisions?
 3. What responsibility do parents have?
 4. What two extremes does the speaker reject?
 5. What solution does the speaker propose?
